We visited Theodore Roosevelt National Park over the summer as part of our Lewis and Clark explorations. I was interested in TR primarily for the natural landscape and the animals -- especially bison. We had a great time, and if you are going to TR, I recommend the NORTH unit. NORTH. The south unit is nice. The north unit is spectacular. Just get out there and explore it. Go in the afternoon and stay till after sunset. We did see bison, and deer, a coyote, prairie dogs, and lots more bison. We used this Falcon Guide, and it had good pointers. The tone of the book is a bit over-familiar...like somebody pinching your cheek at the family reunion -- I don't know how to describe it, but Levi Novey is not a conventional travel guide writer. I would have thought him a much older person, if I hadn't seen his photo on the back cover. I let my oldest read items out of the book for us -- it was just about his speed and "corniness" level. The book gives you a bigger version of the National Parks Map, and a lot on things to see if you stick to the national park stopping places. If you are going into the backcountry, of course you will want more specific guidebooks and better maps. In the end -- I found the book to be accurate and interesting and good for families. Thanks, Levi Novey! We'll have lifelong memories because you lured us to TR.  I added 6 of my photos of the park to the review. You'll love TR -- try the north unit!

Not many choices for guidebooks in Roosevelt National Park so we gave this one a try. It was OK. All black and white with the exception of the covers. Wish I knew of a better one that was available.

I was finding it difficult to find good information on Theodore Roosevelt National Park. This book was exactly what I was looking for and it did a great job describing turn by turn what to expect. Great hints. If you're going to TRNP then I highly recommend this book.
